

Scholarship has invested much effort in reconstructing the episodes of civic bloodshed, as well as their causes and consequences that tore apart the Roman republic, from the murder of Tiberius Gracchus and his followers in 133 BC to the battle of Actium in 31 BC.

Yet although there have recently been notable efforts to broaden the perspective accounts of this period still tend to limit the scope of their analysis to the incidents of political murder or the years of actual warfare, the preceding political machinations, and the de-stabilizing consequences for the res publica.

The conference aims to demonstrate that this period merits a much more extensive type of investigation: 'the age of civil war' consists of more than intermittent periods of in-fighting and the eventual emergence of the principate. The constant threat and regular recurrence of internecine warfare also transformed Rome's cultural imaginary; but to write a cultural history of civil war at Rome, we need to explore how the reality (and fear) of civil war became a pervasive aspect of Roman thinking on politics, society, and the nature of civic communities. The conference is designed to bring together historical, archaeological, and literary perspectives to reconstruct the 'culture of civil war' that emerged in first-century BC Rome.
